In The Shadow Of War: New Zealand Soldiers Talk About World War One And Their Lives

Nicholas Boyack Jane Tolerton

First World War homecomings - NZHistory As we approach the end of the centenary of World War One, it is timely to remember that this war changed the world不可一世—and the lives of many New Zealanders. The First World War was a defining event in New Zealand's history, and it had far-reaching impacts on the lives of soldiers, families, and civilians alike. In their book "In the Shadow of War: New Zealand Soldiers Talk About World War One and Their Lives," Nicholas Boyack and Jane Tolerton explore the stories of New Zealand soldiers who took part in this global conflict. Their accounts offer a glimpse into the experiences of soldiers on leave in Britain and Australia, as well as the challenges they faced upon returning home. The book also highlights the impact of the war on civilians, including those who supported soldiers and the families they left behind. Through the recollections of war veterans, the authors aim to explain how the First World War shaped the wider thesis of New Zealand's role in the global conflict. The experiences of service in the First World War—The experiences of service in the First World War continue to shape our understanding of the war and its legacy. The book is a valuable resource for researchers and the general public interested in the history of World War One and its impact on New Zealand.
